The Jewellery Market

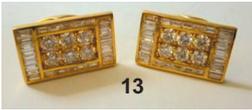

John Ainsley

In this continuing jewellery series I have downloaded about a hundred lots from our Premier Online Database, which have been sold at UK auctions in the last few months. Online our jewellery database contains about 20,000 lots sold at auction in the last several years. New readers should be aware that buying jewellery at auction provides the choice, not only of modern pieces - much of their stock is of recent origin-but jewellery and styles covering several centuries. I can also certainly advise buying at retail, when the jeweller specialises in secondhand jewellery, and there are some excellent shops around the country. However the average high street jeweller will in the main only provide you with a choice of new jewellery, which is of course restricted to the latest styles. Additionally profit margins for the retailer dealing in new jewellery are necessarily higher, and with the addition of VAT, now at 20%, secondhand prices can be two to two and a half times lower at auction than buying new, and I know of good secondhand jewellers where prices can be at least a third cheaper than buying new. In any event it is what comes along at the time but my advice is to keep an eye on secondhand sales at auction and at retail. And following on from this my advice is never to buy new jewellery. It represents extremely poor value for money and is therefore hardly the way to make prudent use of the personal or family budget. In recent years I have represented several young men seeking to buy engagement rings in my area and in all cases I have been able to point them towards acquiring good sized solitaire diamonds of a carat or a carat and a half for £1,000 - £2,000, when on the high street they would need a magnifying glass to see the stone they would get for that price. £999 is typical for a 0.5ct stone if you are lucky, and they can be much more.

Everyone is aware of how precious metal prices have been rising in recent years, and diamonds continue to go up in price anyway. Two or three years ago I could have bought decent one carat diamond rings for £700-£800 but not anymore. Ignoring the solitaire at 15, which has a Tiffany attribution and probably above average clarity and colour, the ring at 23 is a good indication of today's auction prices for a good one carat solitaire set in platinum, and at 58 is a typical half carat solitaire at a typical auction price of £377. This would cost probably £999 new on the high street. For those whose budget can stretch further - and it is surprising how much young men are prepared to invest in an engagement ring, there can be little better than the old cut 1.74ct solitaire at 16 and £2,832. This will probably date from the 1900-1930 period - the classic and most desirable period jewellery of all. At the lower top end off the market see the 3.65ct cushion cut solitaire at 2 and just under £10,000 - the best example here for those who could afford it. See also the possibilities at 8, 20, 36, 40 and 74.

Readers should check these four pages and browse those areas of the market which holds their interest. There is something for everybody. Gold jewellery can easily be checked against the market prices for gold. See page four, which carries recent scrap value tables and use the arithmetic to compare 9, 11, 41 or 64 and 65. For example at 64 the 9ct gold bracelet weighs 24.4 grams and as I write 9ct gold scrap is about £12-13 per gram so the anticipated price range is £293-£320 and it fetched £330. On our website home page at www.antiques-info.co.uk readers can get the continuously updated day-to-day values of precious metals. This link in itself is beginning to be 'worth its weight in gold' to users, who can follow the market as it changes. Here you do not need to be a precious metals expert to work out how much the 18ct multi-strand necklace at 11 was likely to fetch. All you need, for speed, is a calculator.

Next to rings, earrings are the next most popular and they first appear at 17, but we can only guess at their carat weight as being probably 0.75-1ct per stone. As solitaires these are a worthwhile buy, but when the solitaire diamonds get too small, and I would suggest at about 0.5cts per stone they become insignificant and it is much better to buy diamond cluster earrings, where the effective spread against the car is much greater. See 50 and 85. Incidentally I also like the earrings at 31 and 34 for something different and different colours can match different clothing. And of course there is day wear and evening wear but for the latter there is nothing to compare with the multi-coloured flashes emanating from diamonds when dining under subdued electric lighting or candlelight. I have read that the popularity of diamonds, which emerged in the early twentieth century, actually coincides with the introduction of electric lighting. Incidentally it is also possible to buy unmounted stones. At 26 is a brilliant cut oval-shaped diamond of average or below clarity and colour, which fetched £1,085. This can be mounted on a ring style of your choice for a few hundred pounds and is an alternative if you cannot find the style of your choice or you feel uncomfortable at the thought of wearing a secondhand ring.
